

Regulating ownership is categorically in the public interest. I'm a media professional who has worked and continue to work variously for, around and with the coporations that have been accumulating greater and greater media interests. As regulations have loosened over the past 10-15 years, there have been unquestionable increases in conflicts, and indeed abuses, of interest. Whether you believe that press is in the hands of too many liberals, or that the press kowtows to the Administration, it is the FCC's responsibility to create an environment that fosters our democracy by allowing for as free as possible a flow of information, and that discourages the concentration of that flow of information into the hands of a few powerful corporations.